

Περίληψη :

The Byzantine family of Maniakes came from central Asia Minor and emerged in the early 11th century. Its first known member is Goudelios Maniakes. His son, George, distinguished himself during the wars against the Arabs on the eastern border and in Sicily. In 1042-1043 he rebelled and was finally killed while fighting against the imperial troops. Theophylaktos Maniakes, another distinguished member of the family, became a strategos in 1057. After the 11th century, we lose trace of the Maniakes family.

1. Emergence of the Family

The Maniakes family, whose residence was in Asia Minor, became powerful in the Middle Byzantine period, particularly at the end of 10th and in the 11th century, while its members distinguished themselves as military officers. Having become powerful, some of them rebelled against the imperial authority.

2. Prominent Members

The first known member of the family is Goudelios Maniakes, who was possibly born in the third quarter of the 10th century. There is no information about his roots, although some scholars believe that he was of Slavic (probably Bulgarian) origin.¹ Nothing is known about his birthplace or whether he was of noble descent.

There is more information about the son of Goudelios, George, who was born towards the late 10th or the early 11th century and is known to have owned large estates. It is also known that his property and that of Romanos Skleros abutted in the theme of Anatolikon, in central Asia Minor. There is no more information about the marital status of George, apart from the fact that he was married and a brief reference to his wife.² As a result, nothing is known about his relations with the other identified member of the family, Theophylaktos Maniakes, who must have been born in the first quarter of the 11th century.

There is no evidence about the education or the upbringing of the family members. In all probability, they must have received an education higher than the usual general studies, as they made a career in the army as officers.

3. Activity of the Maniakes Family

Historical sources provide scant information about the career of Goudelios Maniakes, unless he is actually identified with the aristocrat accused of conspiracy against Constantine VIII (1025-1028). His son, George Maniakes, was serving in 1030 as a strategos of the theme of Telouch. In August of the same year he eliminated a force of 800 Arabs, who were returning triumphantly after their victory over Emperor Romanos III Argyros (1028-1034). As a reward he was awarded the title protospatharios and commander of the cities along the border of the Euphrates River, with Samosata of Mesopotamia as his base. Towards the late October 1031³ he managed to occupy Edessa and repel a counterattack by the local Arab emir. For this success George Maniakes was awarded the honorary title patrikios.

In 1034-1035, by order of the new Emperor Michael IV Paphlagon (1034-1041), he was transferred from Edessa to Vaspurakan.

In 1037-1038, at the head of an expeditionary corps, he was sent to recapture Sicily, occupied by Muslims at the time. Thanks to his military skill, George Maniakes was highly successful and subordinated several cities of east Sicily by defeating the Arabs of Sicily and North Africa in Rametta in 1038 and in Dragines in 1040. However, his conflict with patrikios Stephen, commander of the fleet in Sicily and brother-in-law of the emperor, resulted in his being slandered by the latter. Towards the end of 1040 he was recalled to Constantinople and was imprisoned as a suspect for rebellion.

In the beginning of 1042 the new Emperor Michael V Calaphates (1041-1042), son of patrikios Stephen, set him free and sent him back to the West. Michael V was deposed in April 1042, but shortly later Empress Zoe appointed Maniakes as commander in Italy and honoured him with the title of magistros.

In the summer of 1042, in Italy, George Maniakes confronted successfully the revolted Norman mercenaries but showed cruelty to the populations of the cities he reoccupied. However, Maniakes did not manage to complete his mission because he was recalled when Constantine IX Monomachus (1042-1055) ascended to the throne. In August-September 1042 he was removed from the command of the troops in South Italy because of Romanos Skleros, who took advantage of his influence over the emperor (his sister was the mistress of Monomachus) and took revenge for earlier disputes over land property. The reaction of Maniakes was to openly rebel against the emperor. During the battle (between April and June 1043) in the area of Marmari, near Amphipolis of the Struma (Strymon) River, George Maniakes was fatally injured.

As regards the activity of Theophylaktos Maniakes, the third identified member of the family, who was loyal to Emperor Michael VI (1056-1057), it is known that in the summer of 1057 he failed to deal successfully with the rebel Isaac Komnenos in Bithynia and resorted to Constantinople.

In general, after the 11th century, the Maniakes family does not seem to have played any active role in the political and military matters of the empire.

4. Evaluation and Opinions

In Byzantine sources comments are made only about George Maniakes. We are given definitely favourable opinions, as all historians underline his military skills and his courage. Even the scholar Michael Psellos, who was a member of the emperor Constantine IX Monomachus' court, seems to be impressed by the great size and the spirit of Maniakes, whom he knew personally. What is more, the scholar reports that Maniakes rightly earned his promotions and offices, while the accusations made against him at times came from aspersions cast on him or calumnies. Only the sources of western origin are against George Maniakes and they repeatedly report the atrocities he committed in South Italy. The fact is that his name remained indelibly graven on the memory of the people in the areas where he lived and was active.⁴

Most modern scholars don't argue against the positive depiction of George Maniakes in Byzantine sources. Although there are certain historians who disagree with the opinion that the court of Constantine IX was the only one responsible for the developments that led to Maniakes' rebellion and death, most of them evaluate his actions positively and recognise his military skills.

1. Goudelios Maniakes is usually erroneously identified with Goudelios who was punished as a conspirator by the Emperor Constantine VIII (1025-1028). See A. Γ. Κ. Σαββίδης, Γεώργιος Μανιάκης. Κατακτήσεις και υπονόμηση στο Βυζάντιο του 11ου αιώνα (Athens 2004), pp. 29-32 including criticism of the earlier theory supporting the Maniakes family was of Turkish origin.

2. The information that Maniakes was married and that his wife remained in the family estates in Asia Minor while he was away in Italy, is provided by Skylitzes, I. Thurn, (ed.) Iohannis Scylitzae Synopsis Historiarum (Corpus Fontium Historiae Byzantinae 5, Berlin - New York 1973), p. 427, 65-66. According to C. Brand – A. Cutler, 'Maniakes George', The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium 2 (New York - Oxford 1991), p. 1285, there was some George Maniakes possessing land in Central Greece, who may have been a grandson bearing the same name, unless he can be identified with the strategos. In case he was a grandson, he may have possessed the seal presented by K. M. Κωνσταντόπουλος, 'Η σφραγίς του στρατηγού Μανιάκη', Επετηρίς Εταιρείας Βυζαντινών Σπουδών 9 (1932), pp. 123-128, which probably did not belong to strategos Maniakes.

3. The exact chronology is based on the analysis of the Arabic sources by W. Felix, Byzanz und die islamische Welt in früheren 11. Jahrhundert (Byzantina Vindobonensia 14, Wien 1981), pp. 128, 143-145; Δ. Ζακυθηνός, Βυζαντινή Ιστορία 324-1971 (Athens 1972), p. 467, and Αικατερίνη Χριστοφιλοπούλου, *Βυζαντινή Ιστορία*² 2 (Thessaloniki 1997), p. 197, believe that Edessa fell in 1032.

4. The name 'Maniakes tower' has been preserved for buildings in Edessa, Syracuse, Dragines and Messina of Sicily. In Messina there is a church called Santa Maria di Maniace. Moreover, it seems that notable citizens of Italian cities were given the general's name as their baptismal or family name and this must explain the existence of some Giorgio Maniace in Taranto in the 12th c. Finally, the name of George Maniakes is found in the Scandinavian epics of the 13th c. See Α. Γ. Κ. Σαββίδης, Γεώργιος Μανιάκης. Κατακτήσεις και υπονόμευση στο Βυζάντιο του 11ου αιώνα (Athens 2004), pp. 22, 35, 45-46, 63.

	magistros Higher office that Philotheos in his Kletorologion places above the anthypatos. This title lost its importance from the 10th century and gradually disappeared - most probably in the middle of the 12th century.
	patrikios (from lat. patricius) Higher title of honour, placed, according to the " Tactika " of the 9th and the 10th centuries, between anthypatos and protospatharios . It was given to the most important governors and generals. Gradually, however, it fell into disuse and from the 12th century did not exist any more.
	protospatharios The first spatharios. A higher byzantine official of the imperial hierarchy which usually permitted participation in the senate. It was awarded even to eunuchs. After the 11th century, it gradually lost its importance. It was also an honorary title.
	strategos ("general") During the Roman period his duties were mainly political. Office of the Byzantine state's provincial administration. At first the title was given to the military and political administrator of the themes, namely of the big geographic and administrative unities of the Byzantine empire. Gradually the title lost its power and, already in the 11th century, strategoi were turned to simple commanders of military units, responsible for the defence of a region.

Translation: While strategos George Maniakes was the ruler of the theme of Telouch, 800 Arabs returning with a mood of bellicosity from their victory [against the Byzantine troops] arrived in his region and ordered him to leave quickly and abandon the city because, as they claimed, the emperor had been captured and the Byzantine expeditionary corps had been eliminated. He was advised to avoid being exposed to an obvious danger because the following day he and his troops would be encircled and perish in a horrible way. Maniakes pretended that he accepted their advice and obeyed their orders. What is more, he sent them food and drinks and advised them to rest because on the following day he and his men would leave the place, while the Arabs could capture the city of Telouch and acquire the Byzantine riches. The Arabs were deceived by his words and deeds and, believing that everything would fall into their hands, they started to drink and booze and spent their night without fear and precautions. However, Maniakes attacked the sleeping and drunken Arabs, who had not taken any precautions, in the dead of night and killed them all. Two hundred and eighty camels loaded with all kinds of plunder taken from the Byzantines fell into his hands. He severed the noses and the ears of the dead soldiers and took them to the emperor, who had fled to the house of Phokas in Cappadocia. The emperor recognised his deed and appointed him as katepano of Lower Media.

Translation: In that year the protospatharios George Maniakes, son of Goudelios Maniakes and strategos of the cities on the Euphrates, with his base in the city of Samosata of Osrhoene, tried to capture Edessa. The city was governed by Salamane the Turk, who had been appointed by the emir of Martyroupolis, a city also known as Mieferkeim. After he was given gifts, promises and honours, Salamane was convinced to surrender the city to Maniakes during the night. He captured three mighty towers and repelled the conquerors bravely, at the same time asking for reinforcement from outside. When Apomerbanes, the emir of Mieferkeim, was informed about the fall of Edessa, he arrived without delay with a large force and tried to recapture the towers. However, as he was repelled thanks to the brave resistance of Maniakes, and because he was unable to do anything else, he destroyed the most beautiful buildings, plundered the wealth of the city and the large church and, after he had loaded the camels with the most valuable lootings, set the city on fire before he returned to Martyroupolis. Maniakes was free to capture the acropolis, built on a rocky hill in the middle of the city, asked for reinforcement from outside and safely completed the capture of the city. He also sent to the emperor in Constantinople the letter he had found, which Jesus had written to Abgar.

Translation: After Abu al- Aouar Mohammed, the ruler of Sicily, allied with the emperor, he was awarded the honorary title of magister. But when his brother, Abu Haphs, revolted against him and defeated him, he asked for help from the emperor. It was then that patrikios George Maniakes was sent with troops to S. Italy as chief commander. Patrikios Stephen, husband of the emperor's sister, was also sent there as fleet commander.

Translation: As soon as patrikios George Maniakes arrived in Sicily, the potentates of the island, the two brothers, reconciled and tried to turn him out. They sent for an allied force of 50,000 men from N. Africa. When the force arrived a great battle was fought in the area of the so-called Rhimata and Maniakes devastated the Arabs of Africa. It was a horrible massacre and the nearby river turned red from the blood. Then Maniakes captured thirteen cities of Sicily and gradually gained control over the entire island.

Translation: In Sicily, when the Arabs of North Africa recovered from the previous defeat and after they had gathered a force larger than before, they landed again on Sicily aiming to turn Maniakes out. The Arabs camped on a flat and vast plain called Dragines and waited. When Maniakes was informed about the developments, he gathered his troops and marched towards them, after he had previously ordered patrikios Stephen, the emperor's son-in-law and fleet commander, to closely supervise the coast in case the Arabs escaped and returned to their base after the battle. Maniakes actually confronted the Arabs and defeated them. Fifty thousand Arabs were killed then, but their leader ran away and, after he got on a fast boat, escaped from Stephen's patrol vessels and went to his country. Maniakes considered it a bad development. When Stephen went to meet him, Maniakes threw a lot of epithets at him and whipped him repeatedly on the head calling him lazy and coward and accusing him of betraying the emperor's interests. Because Stephen could not swallow the insulting and the abusive language, he immediately sent a letter to Orphanotrophos accusing Maniakes of preparing a revolt against the emperor. Maniakes was chained and transferred to Constantinople without delay, where he was imprisoned together with patrikios Basileios Theodorokanos, while Stephen and praepositus Basileios Padiadites, an eunuch sent as a co-commander, led the expeditionary corps. The only thing they managed to do was to lead everything to destruction by betraying Sicily because of dishonest speculation, cowardice and indolence. When Maniakes captured a city on the island, he used to build an acropolis and put the necessary guards so that the locals would not be able to conspire and recapture the city. However, when he was chained and taken to Constantinople, the locals took advantage of the neglectful and inert strategoi and, after they summoned the Arabs of North Africa to help them, attacked the cities, captured the guards, destroyed the acropolises and recaptured all the cities except for Messina [...]. In this way, the entire Sicily, which was nearly completely conquered by Maniakes, soon came under the Arabs again because of the careless and inefficient strategoi. Messina was the only city that was saved, as mentioned above. Stephen and Padiadites escaped to South Italy.

Translation: Magister George Maniakes, who had been sent by Empress Zoe to Italy to deal with the situation (which was difficult because of the inexperienced and corrupt strategoi), decided to revolt. It is worth mentioning in brief the causes of the defection. When he was sent for the first time to Italy by Emperor Michael in order to fight at the side of Abu al- Aouar Mohammed, the ruler of Sicily, who was at war with his brother and the Arabs of N. Africa, Maniakes also recruited 500 Franks invited from France under some Ardoin, the ruler of some independent region. With their help Maniakes managed to defeat the Arabs. However, when he was defamed and was deprived of his leadership and was driven to Constantinople, where he was imprisoned, protospatharios Michael Dokeianos was sent to replace him as the commander of Italy. The latter was unable to handle complicated matters. He soon made a mess of everything. He was late with the monthly wages of the Franks, while their leader, who went to beg him to treat his soldiers better and reward their efforts, is said to have been dishonoured by Dokeianos, who insulted and whipped him. In this way, he made the people revolt. When they resorted to arms, Dokeianos avoided concentrating all Byzantine troops in order to confront them, but took the battalion of Opsikion and some Thracians and confronted the rebels at Cannes, near the Amphidos River, in the position where Hannibal had eliminated many thousands of Romans. After Dokeianos was defeated and lost most of his army, he escaped humiliated in Cannes. Although he suffered such a terrible blow, he did not change his attitude. He neither marched against the enemy when he was reinforced with his entire army, but it seems that he was guided by irrational courage and, after he took with him the same defeated soldiers as well as the Pisidians and the Lycaonians, who were the battalion of the foederatoi, and fought against his enemies near the so-called Hores, where he was totally defeated once again, because the Franks had been reinforced with the Italian people of the region of the Po River and the feet of the Alps. When Emperor Michael was informed of these developments, he withdrew Dokeianos and replaced him with Boioannes, who was considered practical and useful for war and was descended from the deceased Boioannes who had been sent to Italy by Emperor Basil and had submitted the entire Italy as far as Rome in the name of the emperor. However, when he arrived in Italy he did not have a new and powerful army, but had to fight in the area of Monopolis followed by soldiers already defeated by the enemy who had settled and defended the country as if it was theirs. Boioannes was defeated and captured, while his soldiers who were not killed were scattered in the strongholds that were still under the Byzantines. From then on the Franks considered Italy their loot and the locals, either voluntarily or violently, submitted to them except for Brindisi, Otranto, Taranto and Bari. These four cities remained loyal to the Byzantines. When Emperor Michael died and his successor lost the throne, Maniakes, as mentioned above, was sent to Italy by Empress Zoe. Although he did not lead a remarkable army, he devised effective strategies and managed to turn the Franks out of Italy; they went to the regions of Capua and Benevento of Napoli, and thus the worst passed. This Maniakes had his estates in the theme of Anatolikon, abutted with those of Romanos Skleros. They had a feud and Maniakes tried to kill Romanos several times, but the latter escaped and was saved. However, when Constantine IX Monomachus assumed power and Skleros realised that his future would improve (because Skleros' sister was Monomachus' mistress) and when he was awarded the title of magister and was appointed as prototrator, he remembered the raids of Maniakes and, on taking advantage of his administrative authority and the absence of Maniakes, plundered and burned the property that belonged to Maniakes and, furthermore, dishonoured his wedding bed. When Maniakes, who was in Italy, was informed of the news, he was discontent and became furious. Shortly later, when on Skleros' accusations he was replaced, and because he was in a desperate position (because he knew that his return to Constantinople would not have a happy ending for him), he revolted against the emperor after he had triggered agitations and a rebellion among the troops of Italy, as the soldiers wanted avidly to return home. He killed his replacement (the protospatharios Pardos, who came from Constantinople and took advantage of his acquaintance with the emperor in order to assume power in such a province), while he was crowned and was proclaimed emperor after appropriating the imperial symbols. He then embarked his troops on boats and landed on the opposite Balkan territories. When the emperor was informed of the news, he became anxious and sent a letter to Maniakes in which he guaranteed him and his followers that they would be granted amnesty. He also summoned them to lay down arms and promised them great honours. However, because Maniakes was indivertible in his opinion, the emperor also gathered troops and, after appointing sebastophoros Stephen, who had announced him in Damokraneia the news that he would become an emperor, as the absolute commander, he sent him against the revolter. The two armies were met in the region of the so-called Ostrobos, in Marmarion, and the soldiers of Stephen fled in disorder after the battle, while Maniakes was at the head of his side and scattered his enemies. His soldiers were applauding him calling him emperor when Maniakes suddenly fell off his horse and died without obvious reason, although he was fatally wounded on the chest. When the news spread on the opposite side, Maniakes was beheaded and all those who had followed him in the revolt were captured after they had laid down arms and surrendered when they saw their commander dying. A messenger announced the happy news of the victory to the emperor, while some days later Stephen entered Constantinople bringing the head of Maniakes and the prisoners of war. A triumphal procession passed all along the Plateias road, while the head of Maniakes impaled on a spear was at the head of the procession. Then came the revolters sitting on donkeys and Stephen riding a white horse. This is how the events connected with Maniakes came to an end.

Translation: This George Maniakes was not a servant who had suddenly become a strategos and was not one of those people who serve as promoters with their trumpets and the following day they become the commanders of the army. He started step by step and gradually ascended to the rank of strategos after assuming all the intermediate titles because he deserved it. However, when he achieved something and gained his laurels, he would find himself chained and sent to prison by the emperor. On the one hand he was sent as strategos holding absolute power in order to command the army, while, on the other hand, he would be betrayed by those who led him to trouble. He captured Edessa and faced accusations; he was sent to conquer Sicily and was recalled in the most humiliating way so that the island would not be occupied by him. I saw and admired this man because nature had given him all the merits of someone who wanted to become a military leader. He was ten feet tall and those who faced him raised their eyes high as if they looked at a hill or a summit. His face was neither pleasant nor sweet, but looked like thunder. He had a loud voice and his hands were so strong that they could shake a wall and shatter bronze gates. He was as vehement as a lion and he had a stern look. All his features confirmed and agreed with the above, while his fame magnified his physical presence. All the barbarians were very much afraid of him, either because they had seen or admired him or because they had heard of him and had been terrified. When we lost Italy and were deprived of the most valuable part of the territory, the second Michael sent him to fight against those who had captured it and return those regions to the imperial power. When I say 'Italy' I do not mean the entire peninsula but only the part that is closer to us and has adopted the name of the entire country. When Maniakes arrived there with his soldiers, he started to implement all kinds of strategies and it was obvious that he would turn the conquerors out. Moreover, he would repel the enemy's attacks with his own hands. But when Michael was dethroned and Emperor Constantine assumed power, whose history I have decided to write, the latter should reward him [Maniakes] with all kinds of letters and crown him with myriads of wreaths and, generally, do everything in order to recompense him. However, the emperor was completely indifferent and filled Maniakes with suspicions about his power and future disasters. Even when he remembered him and learnt that he was discontent and planned a revolt, he did not deal successfully with the problem. Instead of pretending that he ignored the plans, he exploded against Maniakes as if the latter had already revolted. So he did not send representatives to wheedle, calm and recall him to order, but, to say the least, to kill him or blame him for his discontent, almost whip him and lead him chained to Constantinople. In charge of the mission was a man who was not experienced in similar situations and did not have any political or military power; he was one of those scoundrels who suddenly found themselves in the palace. As soon as he reached the revolter, who was in command of the army and worried about the reason of the representative's arrival, he did not made it clear to him that he was there in order to start peace negotiations nor had he informed him about his arrival. He arrived without warning and, after rushing to him on horseback without saying anything about reconciliation, without any introduction so that the discussion could be helped, he attacked openly showering abuses upon him and threatening him. Maniakes grew certain about his previous suspicions and, fearing for an intrigue, became furious and raised his hand to frighten him. The representative, as if he had already arrested him red-handed, blamed him for his audacity and told him that he would not escape after such a serious crime. When Maniakes and his army realised there was no hope, they killed the representative and, certain that the emperor would retaliate, revolted. Because Maniakes was brave and a great military governor, his army was flooded with both underage and old men and not only with people eligible for the army. However, because Maniakes knew that strategy and experience, and not numbers, won victories in battles, he gathered the most experienced men, with whom he had captured lots of cities and loot and captives, and landed on the opposite bank as he had escaped the attention of the ships surveying the coast. None of those who had been sent against them dared to confront him, but let him advance undisturbed. These were the actions of Maniakes. As for the emperor, when he was informed about the murder of his representative and the desperate deed of Maniakes, he gathered a big army against him. Then, he was afraid that the commander of that army, after he had managed to iron out the revolter, could take advantage of his deed and become an even more rebutable renegade, as he would command a huge army that could help him achieve anything he wanted. That is why he did not give the command to some of his bravest strategoi, but to an eunuch loyal to him, but who was not respected by anybody. The latter left Constantinople and marched against the revolter with a big army. When Maniakes learnt that the entire Byzantine army was against him, he was not afraid either by the number of his opponents or the extent of the mobilisation. He only thought about the usurpation of the throne and tried to take his opponents by surprise when they were still disorganised. He suddenly appeared in front of them, for his army marched without transport facilities. When the opponents managed to draw up and resist, they faced the rage of the man who was said to be impossible to face. Maniakes was shouting dreadful war cries and crossed the army on horseback spreading fear to all who faced him. He immediately scattered his opponents thanks to his bravery, but was defeated by a superior will, which remains a fathomless mystery to all us mortals. As he rattled and surrounded our troops fiercely, he scattered the dense phalanx of our soldiers, while the entire army was cut up. He then suddenly suffered a serious and deep blow on the right side and his blood started to flow. As if he had not felt the blow and had only seen his blood flowing, he put his hand on the wound and, on realising it was a fatal blow, lost all his hopes and tried to return to his camp walking away on the troops. But he was unable to ride his horse, as his body was very weak and he felt dizzy. He heaved a soft sigh and after he left the reins and slipped off the saddle, he dropped dead. It was a deplorable sight. Even when they saw him dead, our soldiers did not manage to find their lost courage; they pulled on the reins fearing that what they saw was a trick. Finally, when they realised that Maniakes' servant had fled and the horse ran free among the soldiers, they all rushed to the dead man and were amazed at the area his body occupied. They cut his head and took it to their commander. Later, many people claimed that they had killed Maniakes, while there were lots of invented versions of his death. As there was no way to find if this is true, a story was invented about some unknown riders who darted up to him and beheaded him. However, these fables are not grounded. As for the wound on his side, it had been caused by a spear, although the perpetrator remains unknown until today. This is how his life came to an end, while he had repeatedly suffered injustices and had committed few of the things he was accused of. As for his army, some soldiers escaped secretly to their birthplaces, although most of them joined our forces and, before the troops returned to the emperor, the revolter's head was sent to him. The emperor, as if he had got rid of a wave that had covered him, took a deep breath and thanked God. He put the head at the highest point of the Hippodrome so that everybody could see it even from afar.

Translation: As soon as the deceased Emperor Michael, who came from the province of Paphlagonia, had assumed the throne in Byzantium the Arabs of the West were defeated in Sicily by the Byzantine infantry and fleet. If the chief strategos, the deceased George Maniakes, had not been wrongly accused of revolt, and had not been eliminated so that the war could be made by others, the large and famous island, which is adorned with big cities and does not lack anything, would be under the Byzantines today. But envy destroyed the man and his actions as well as this great task, because the strategoi that succeeded him were so inefficient and coward that the largest part of the army was lost together with the island. Moreover, the once allies and subjects of our country as well as our Christian brothers, Albanians and Latins who inhabit the Italian land to the south of Rome, became our bitter enemies because of the bad behaviour of the then strategos, the duke Michael Dokeianos, towards their leader.

Translation: Monomachus proved more generous than the previous emperor and pleased his subjects by offering state positions and valuable gifts to almost all of them. Suddenly a dark and terrible danger appeared from the West threatening to eliminate and dethrone him. It was George Maniakes with his Byzantine and Albanian soldiers, a brave and bloodthirsty man, who was on his way back from Italy, which he ruled. He was discontent because he had not been honoured by the emperor and was afraid of their previous enmity. He had defeated all the troops he had found in his way. He camped within a distance of two-day march from Thessaloniki and late in the afternoon he confronted the main body of the imperial forces under their leader who had been sent by the emperor to confront him. His valour against the imperial soldiers was admired by them, while his uncontrollable vehemence and the blows he delivered with his own hand (he fought in front of his soldiers and his life was at risk on the front line) astonished them. All those who suffered his sword strokes were almost cut in two, while he seemed so invincible, redoubtable and sturdy, as he was tall and big and very intelligent, that when he had almost won the victory his opponents cheered him as an emperor. It was towards the end of the battle that he fell off his horse, without reason, it must have been God's will, and landed on the ground without being touched. His opponents believed that it was some trick of his, but when they realised the truth, they ran to him and found him in blood because he had been fatally wounded on his side. When his men saw that he was killed and they would be defeated, they were scattered, while the imperial soldiers did not boast about their victory and returned full of joy and fear, believing that their victory had come thanks to God's intervention.

4. A Version of the Fall of Magna Graecia to George Maniakes and the Following Revolt

Κατεσχέθη δὲ ἡ Λογγιβαρδία πρὸς τοῦ Ρομπερτου τοῦτον τὸν τρόπον. Γεώργιος ὁ Μανιάκης ἐπὶ καταστάσει τῶν ἐν Ἰταλία πραγμάτων ἀποσταλεῖς, παρὰ τῆς αὐγούστης Ζωῆς μάγιστρος τιμηθεῖς, προσηταιρίσατο μὲν Φράγκους πολλούς, καθημέρωσε δὲ καὶ τοὺς παρὰ τοῦ Δοκειανοῦ κακωθέντας καὶ ἡσυχίαν ἄγειν ἐν τισὶ θέμασι τῆς Ἰταλίας παρεσκεύασεν· ἐδεδίεσαν γὰρ αὐτὸν πείραν τῆς αὐτοῦ ἐν πολέμοις γενναϊότητος ἔχοντες. Ἀντάραντος δὲ τῶ Μονομάχῳ καὶ κατηγωνισμένου, οἱ μὲν σὺν αὐτῶ περιωθέντες τῶ βασιλεῖ δουλωθέντες Μανιακάτοι τε ἐπανομάσθησαν καὶ τῇ Ῥωμαίων πολλοὶ ἐναπέμειναν, οἱ δὲ λοιποὶ ἐν Ἰταλία ὑπελείφθησαν.

Translation: South Italy was conquered by Robert Guiscard as follows. When George Maniakes was sent to restore the the Italian matters to stability, after he was awarded the title of magister by Empress Zoe, he was followed by lots of Franks and managed to calm those who had been harmed by Dokeianos and peacefully settle them in some of the themes of Italy, as they were afraid of him because they knew that he was a very brave fighter. However, when he revolted against Monomachus and was defeated, some of those who had followed him from Italy submitted to the emperor; they were renamed Maniakatoi and remained in Byzantine territories, while the rest of them remained in Italy.
